Introduction
After the exhaustive distribution of the land territory, the human beings make their steps toward the ocean in order to exploit and utilize the ocean resources. Islands ' delimitation potency has a significant influence on determining the sea boundary between the countries involved. according to the widespread national practices and international judicial legal precedents , islands could obtain either entire , partial,or no potency for the adjoining countries as well as countries facing each other across the seacoast. The degree of potency to which islands can obtain is influenced by many factors .In other words , it depends on the position and the nature of the islands The sea-bed and subsoil of many continental shelves or exclusive economic zones of potential possession of resources become the overlapping areas of the states with adjacent or opposite coasts. These situations induce many problems of the maritime delimitation and the exploitation of resources, and attract international concerns as well as theoretical research. In fact, every state moves toward the ocean ; more and more countries are interested in the exploitation of the overlapping areas and the number of Joint Development across boundaries is also increasing rapidly. We will examine the relevant legal problems of the Joint Development system and introduces some state practices with view to offering theoretical support and some guidelines in pragmatic implications. We will consult the foreign and national Sea Law scholars ' research results, concerning the geology, geography and delimitation of continental shelf to East China Sea; and take also reference from the international concerned practices as well as judicial cases. We expect to propose some constructive opinions from several angles of international politics, economies and exploitation of natural resource etc., and hope to offer some beneficial consultation for the future resolution of this complicated issue.
